RELAX, SANTEE! HOW COME YOU MADE IT SO FAR DOWN THE STREET WITHOUT A SHOWDOWN?
I DON'T KNOW! I JUST CAN'T FIGURE IT! MAYBE I WAS WRONG ABOUT EVERYTHING!

I WAS SURE SOMEBODY WOULD JUMP ME BEFORE NOW! YOU KNOW, I'M BREATHIN' EASY FOR THE FIRST TIME IN YEARS!

SHAKE HANDS WITH THE HOMBRE WHO PROVED THAT A GUN, FIGHTIN' ON THE RIGHT SIDE, NEVER HAS TO BE A "SCARED" GUN!
GOOD LUCK, SANTEE! I THINK TOTEM'S GOT ITSELF A FIRST RATE LAW TEAM!

MAN IN THE MOONLIGHT

SEVERAL things were bothering eight-year-old Jim Hayden, as he left his father's ranch house in the early chill of the morning. The first was the long red woolen underwear his mother had insisted he put on. The underwear itched. The second thing that bothered him was his new shepherd dog he'd named Kip, that his father had bought in Nogales two days before. Kip was big, friendly, but a little uncontrollable. Jim's father had said there was nothing to worry about, that Kip would come round in time. But Jim was worried. The third thing that bothered him was his friend and fellow school-mate, Hank Beakett, also eight. For several days now, after school, Hank had been depressed. Instead of stopping on the way home from school with Jim, Hank had continued on to his own father's spread. That really worried Jim most of all, for Hank, up to now, had been an enthusiastic playmate, eager to play cowboys and Indians, to help rope hundreds of imaginary dogies, and, when weary of play, sit and spin yarns about the old West.

Jim hoped that Hank would be more cheerful this morning. He walked half a mile to the old dirt road and waited for the school bus to come along. It came finally, bright, new and orange-colored, stirring up clouds of silted alkali that glittered like diamonds in the morning sun. It stopped for Jim and he climbed aboard. Hank was sitting in the back seat, not joining in the usual rough-and-tumble that kept the bus driver barking admonitions for order.

Jim seated himself silently by Hank, whose mouth drooped.

"What's the matter with you?" Jim finally said impatiently. "Feller would thing you got the colic or something!"

Hank looked up at him mysteriously and Jim felt better. Knowing himself, he also knew Hank, and that no eight-year-old could hold a secret for more than a day or two. He knew it was so, because he'd tried it himself. For a moment, the two boys stared out the window, as the bus bumped along to the schoolhouse in Big Butte. It was roundup time and hundreds of cattle tramped along placidly over the plains in the direction of Big Butte and the railroad shipping point. Then Hank looked at Jim and beckoned with his finger. Jim placed his ear next to Hank's lips.

"There's a guy that comes at night out by our spread, and stays out in the open!" he whispered, almost hoarsely.

"How'd you spot him?" Jim inquired eagerly.

"I woke up one night for a glass of water and I saw him through the kitchen window. He was standin' up on the high rise near the creek. First he'd stand, and then he'd sorta squat down and then he'd stand again, and . . ." Hank's voice dropped lower. "There was something he had with him, big and bulky. It wasn't a cayuse or anything alive . . . just something like a box."

Jim considered this seriously for a moment. Then Hank continued, "He's been at it three nights now!"

"Did you tell your folks?" Jim asked, hoping Hank hadn't.

A look of scorn appeared on Hank's chubby features.

"Of course not!" he said, and Jim nodded, understanding perfectly. A mystery like this was much too precious and exciting to be revealed to their parents, who might laugh or say something like: "Now run along, little fella! You've just been having bad dreams!"

"What are you planning to do?" Jim asked eagerly. "Why, that guy you saw might be a rustler, havin' a look round and countin' up your Dad's dogies before he and his gang. . . ."

"Or," interrupted Hank even more eagerly, ". . . or maybe he's a robber, gettin' the lay of the land and plottin' to break in and steal something from the house!"

"Well, something's got to be done!" Jim said importantly. "And we're the ones to do it!" His breath quickened. "Why, if we can solve this by ourselves and capture him, we might get medals!"

"You're right!" Hank agreed. "But what can we do?"

Jim considered deeply for a moment, then caught his breath.

"The way I figure it," he said, "we'll set my dog Kip on him. You stop by my house this afternoon on the way back from school and pick up Kip. Shepherd dogs are good watch dogs. Kip'll fix him!"

That afternoon, after school, Hank stopped by Jim's house. Jim explained to his mother that he was loaning Kip to Hank just for a night or two. Mrs. Hayden, wise in the ways of little boys, smiled agreeably as Hank marched out the door with Kip on the end of a long leash. The two boys exchanged significant looks. Then Hank winked and started out over the mesa for his own home, only a mile distant.

But next morning, he was still downcast, when Jim met him in the school bus. Hank shook his head gloomily. "Nothing happened," Hank said. "I let Kip out all right but he didn't bark or anything! And I saw him going up the hill toward that mysterious figure!"

"That settles it!" Jim said forcefully. "You keep Kip there, and I'll go out myself tonight and have a look!"

Hank's jaw dropped in astonishment and admiration. He said nothing, though a look of apprehension began to grow in his eyes.

That night, the moon was at its brightest. Excitement kept Jim awake after he'd gone to bed. For a while, he had qualms about stealing out of the house, but justified himself with the thought that he and Hank were really protecting their families by getting on the trail of the mysterious figure.

When the downstairs clock chimed ten, Jim got up, dressed, let himself out the bedroom window and crawled over the back porch roof until he reached the drainpipe. He climbed down the pipe, scuttled through a break in the fence and lit out for the Beakett homestead. He reached the vicinity of the house in about half an hour. The moon shone brightly, illuminating the whole mesa. Suddenly, he stopped short.

There, ahead of him in the cold light, atop the rise that looked down on the creek, was the very image Hank had described, a big black figure silhouetted by the moon. And it further followed Hank's description by moving about, staring, then rising, then squatting! Jim came out of the shadow of a corral fence near the Beakett house and was about to turn back when a voice behind him spoke. "Jim!"

Jim whirled. It was Hank's father, Mr. Beakett. He came up and took Jim by the hand. "You come with me, Jim," he said gravely. Jim turned his head toward the figure on the rise, only to see it start descending toward the house! With Jim's heart still pounding, he and Mr. Beakett passed Kip sleeping under the back porch, then went inside. In the front parlor, Hank, white and still, was waiting with his mother. Mrs. Beakett was having difficulty keeping her countenance. With a shock, Jim realized she was trying to smother her laughter. Then there came a ponderous knock on the front door. Mr. Beakett opened it, and a big man came in, carrying what appeared to be a large flat square and a tangle of wooden rods. Mr. Beakett burst out laughing, as did the man.

"May I introduce Mr. Miguel Valdez, the famous artist of Tucson," Mr. Beakett said, ceremoniously. "He's been painting the mesa by moonlight from our back rise near the creek. In fact, that's the title of his picture: 'Mesa By Moonlight'!"

Mr. Valdez bowed and produced the picture, which, as Jim and Hank could see, bore out Mr. Beakett's words. The tangle of rods turned out to be an artist's easel and a folding chair. Jim and Hank looked at each other in embarrassment. Now they realized that the mysterious figure had simply been getting up from the chair, surveying the scene, then sitting down again and continuing to paint!

"From now on, maybe you kids will have sense enough to ask your folks what's going on, instead of imagining nonsense like rustlers!" Mr. Beakett said. He smiled at Jim. "Now don't worry. Hank got so upset about what you'd planned doing, that he told me about it. I phoned your folks and explained. And everything's all right!"

"But why didn't Kip bark at Mr. Valdez?" Jim asked.

"Your Dad bought Kip from a Mexican dog dealer in Nogales, didn't he?" Mr. Beakett asked, grinning. "Well, you forgot Kip obeys orders in Spanish. Mr. Valdez found Kip didn't answer to English, so he tried Spanish, and Kip left him alone." He gestured. "Okay, you boys get to bed. Your Dad, Jim, said you might as well follow Kip's example, and spend the night here!"
